Excerpt from The Smyrna Fig: At Home and Abroad; A Treatise on Practical Fig Culture, Together With an Account of the Introduction of the Wild or Capri Fig, and the Establishment of the Fig Wasp (Blastophaga Grossorum) In America Who was the man who first recognized the economic value of the fig (ficus Carica) in its native habitat, and who first took up a specimen tree from its wild environment and planted it in some sheltered situation along the thermal or foothill regions of Asia Minor or Persia? History does not mention. The records of the remote, as well as of the later period, are indeed sadly forgetful of the achievements man has wrought in the perfection of plants and fruits, calculated to contribute to his comforts and provide him food and shelter. Yet history records the deeds of an Alexander and a Caesar, and the lore of books immortalizes the works of a Plato and an Aristotle. The aphorism of satirical Dean Swift, He who makes two blades of grass to grow where only one grew before, is more deserving of mankind than the hordes of politicians and literateurs put together, is indeed sadly out of joint both in the past as well as in the present. The spirit of the anglo-saxon is to the military rather than to the pastoral. He who introduces and perfects a new fruit of real value is quite as much entitled to the homage of his fellow man as he who conquers in battle, or wins renown in the halls of legislation, or in the arts and sciences. Hence, all honor to the pioneers in fig culture, whether in the valleys of the Orient, on...
