The 1916 volume, now presented to the public, marks the transition in economic thought from the theoretic to the practical. Former speakers of the Conference dwelt largely upon what ought to be done. But in 1916 the General Committee made an effort to secure speakers who could tell how to do those things that may be necessary to the national welfare insofar as they might relate to the solution of the American land question and to the future organization of agricultural cooperation. This volume, we believe, presents an advance in agricultural conceptions, and voices sane constructive thoughts with regard to the working out of coordinated national and state policies for solution of land settlement, landlord and tenant, farm credit, personal credit and kindred problems,...
