Excerpt: .sections have been found by projection. Taking the cylinder as the first curved-surfaced solid as our object, the problem is--Problem 49 (Fig. 148).--Given the plan of a cylinder with its axis. perpendicular to the HP , to find its elevation when its length is twice its diameter. Let the circle AB , No. 1, be the given plan; then its centre a will be the plan of the axis of the cylinder. Find by projection the elevation of this axis a . Assume the cylinder to be standing with one end on the HP ; then, as its ends are in the same relative position as the sides of the rectangle which generated them--viz., parallel to each other--and one of them is on the HP , set off on the axis, from the IL , the length of the cylinder in the point a , and through it draw a line parallel to the IL . Now, in looking at the cylinder in the direction of the arrow in the plan No. 1, the visual rays will impinge upon its surface from A to B ; at A and B the rays will be tangential, and being at the same time perpendicular to the plane of projection, or the VP , they will strike both sides of the cylinder in lines drawn through A and B on its surface, perpendicular to the HP . Therefore through A and B , No. 1, draw the lines AC , BD , No. 2, and the required elevation is obtained....
